to motives which govern the decision. But is not always the case, and criminal ge will at times get mixed up with ices with sectarianism, with national pathies. It is not in itself a de- le thing that the grand jury duty be performed by a politician who, as a member of Parliament, has to conciliate all opinion on the hustings, and who as cabinet Minister has to keep on good terms with a majority in the Assembly. If it could done by a competent permanent official, rect to the supervision of the Minister for ice, the chance would be diminished of ascription of wrong motives.

It has frequently been debated in Parlia- whether it would be a change for the ur to exclude both the great law officers of Parliament, but without any considered desirable for political reasons to to great a departure from British constitutional precedent. Recent events, however, naturally suggested the question whether it would not be possible to compromise the difficulty by making one of the law officers permanent, leaving the other open as a political office. This is what is done in the neighbouring colony of South Australia, where the Crown Solicitor, who there performs the duties of Solicitor-General, is a permanent official, while the Attorney-General is a member of Parliament, and goes in and out with the Cabinet. If such a change is desirable, the Government is not inopportune for effecting it.

There is nothing in our Constitution which prevents us from treating as the law of the Medes and Persians. While we may be reasonably satisfied of our British origin and attached to British forms, there is nothing we should always remember when we are disposed to lay stress on Irish precedent. This is that the Constitution of the mother country has never been an absolute fixity. It has always been in a state of flux. In no country has JAMES MACINTOSH'S aphorism, that constitutions grow and are not made, been strictly verified. From the earliest times in which its existence can be traced, it has been plastic under the influence of founding conditions, and it is changing under our eyes. If there is one thing to be remembered which is characteristic of British Constitution, it is that it is the growth of the constitutional spirit of the Irish people, and the instrument for working out their efforts at self-government.

best imitation therefore of this edent', is not to copy the detailed forms to catch the inspiration of the informing gy. If we would do as our ancestors have e, we must adjust our institutions to our umstances, always keeping alive the spirit berty, and seeking to harmonise administrative efficiency with the necessary checks on autocratic abuses. The conditions of our nial government are not in all respects same as those which prevail at the headquarters of the British Empire. We adopted Imperial type of Constitution to start with, we must always hold it flexible to our al position. The use of the Constitution is simply the value of the institution generated it. The thing is to be value the habit of self government, the assertion of individual independence, the habit of com-tion for public purposes, and the surrender of the individual independence in all minor terms—in fact, that happy compromise between the rights of self and the rights of society without which free government is impossible. With this spirit in healthy activity, need never be distressed at the thought of coming un-English, if we depart in formal terms from the English type.

THE HERCULES ROBINSON.—His Excellency the Governor, with Lady Robinson and family, returned from a two-day tour to the A. S. N. Company's mines in the Cove. The Vice-regal party landed at the jetty in the Cove.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE.—Yesterday, Sir James Munro was formally obligated, and took his seat as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. There was a great concourse of spectators, and the legal profession was largely ated. A congratulatory address was delivered by Solicitor-General Butler, who also presented his thanks in a speech in which he felicitously alluded to long connection with both branches of the profession, the sense of the responsibility devolving upon him, and all report will be found in another column.

HIS ATTORNEY-GENERALSHIP.—Mr. Butler's nomination to his office of Attorney-General in the present administration was accepted by His Excellency the Governor; yesterday; and at a meeting of the Executive held in forenoon, the legal distinction of Quetton's Command was made a subject for serious consideration, and generally decided in political circles that the Hon. J. G. F. Innes, attorney-general and representative of the Government in Legislative Council) would succeed Mr. Butler as the law officer of the Crown. Some hon. members of the staff went so far as to refer to the hon. gentleman as quell-General.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 20

After we proceeded to Kennel Islands (Mowat), anchored for the night. This is a pretty little place a little less apparently than Ugar and less population, about twenty or perhaps more. They traded with York Island, as they like to come in with the teachers there. We found some miserable sheds about 5 or 6 feet high and open in that they seemed healthy and cheerful. We urged them to get better houses or move to York Island and their abode there.

The following morning, August 26th, we stood for land, which we reached about noon of the same day. The promise was given to the chief and people during the day that they should have a teacher as soon as they could. That promise had been fulfilled about a week before the present visit. Gulacene and his wife were brought from Mabaluge, and had received a kind

I found their living in a portable little cottage, which had been built by the present residents in 1871. Very many of course, has been done as yet, and people ask them. They get large quantities of the chief and people share what they get with them. Captain Ware, the manager of Mr. Morris's trading station is also very kind. To Messrs. and their agents we owe a deep debt of gratitude. The commencement of the mission they have rendered us invaluable aid.

The male part of the population were almost all from the met them at Ukur, and had pleasant intercourse with the chief. He seemed very anxious to get me to meet us, and intended to follow us with but rough weather came on, and rendered this impossible. Their canoes are large, about 60 feet long, teresting man, but the people hang back, and the teacher was to make Turtle Back Island, or head-quarters, but the people hang back, for Warrigee Island, the account of the which it affords for fishing, but Turtle ^{is} the great advantage of possessing good cultivatable land and plenty of good food it was understood when it was arranged should have a teacher where it should be head-quarters. I left a supply of food with Gualema, that he may get a school like his neighbour's. On the morning of August, we left Warrigee Island and stood for which we reached about 1 p.m.

ory to find the teachers belonging to the main here, but thankful to find all in better health reports that had reached us I had been led to believe was having frequent attacks of fever and seemed much out of health, and some of the boys having occasional, but not severe, attacks. Chitima had made an unsuccessful attempt to run about a fortnight before our visit. They disabled, and they were obliged to pack back to the camp. They had got the canoe repaired, and were ready to start on their return, but we advised them to wait a little longer than a canoe now, however. We have sometimes been deceived, in which case we have suffered, though, as it turned out, we also failed to make our vessel being too large as the canoe was too small, with Josia and Chitima on board, on the passage between Salsb and was unacquainted with the river. The boatmen, however, attempted to bend round Salsb. This might have been dangerous had the weather been moderate. It was so, however, that, after four hours' beating against a strong sea and a very strong wind, we were obliged to return to Tonsu.

On Saturday morning, the weather being a little better, we started, following the inner coast, and after about eight hours' sailing, in a very good look-out, and the lead going all the time, we were without difficulty. We had a good ran, and returned to Tonsu at 1 p.m. It was too rough for us to anchor with safety to anchor; nor did the captain think it safe to attempt to take the vessel up the mouth of the river.

We examined the place, and came to the conclusion that the only thing practicable was to to Tauxn. This was a great disappointment, as he was not to be chosen. We had again a leading wind, and I sailed on my way back to Tauxn a little after noon. The following morning, I went on shore to have a service with the people, and spent an hour with them. They gave us a friendly reception, and I planned to be visited. The congregation consisted exclusively of men and boys; the women and girls kept out of the way, except a very few who were interested in the meeting. I was surprised with the number of people here, and with the number of the children, and felt much that the teachers have not done more amongst them. At the last visit Kerisiano made an effort. He remained some time, and did something towards getting the people to health, but in his failing he returned to Tauxn. The next morning, as the ship was about to sail, I on the morning of Monday, September 9, we Tausan, bringing with us Kila and family, as he in need of clothing. The first and last place we found was Malabug, a small town, about distant from Tausan. We had hoped to reach the at mid-afternoon, but, instead of that, we got out per course, and found ourselves in a labyrinth of hills from which it took us the greater part of very clear. We were Captain McArthur's first voythese parts, and were proceeding in clear sailing we got astray. 'About an hour after sunset we

I went on my way, and reached Malibuago about five o'clock. The teacher Waamaa, and family well, and a little sickness of the trust; but there are great prospects against this island. There is a great advantage over most of the others here from fever and ague. There is but one here at present, but there will be another soon. There is only the one island to look after, and I am sufficient. Instead of that, however, there are three islands, all within a few miles of each other. The Banks Islands (Mus) and Malgrave (Bada) are the largest islands in the Straite, with the single one the Prince of Wales. The distance between Mus and Mus is only five miles, and that and Bada are reached by a narrow channel some two or three miles wide. The form of the safe harbor is a triangle. The distance Malbuago has great relative importance.

Others on it, with a boat, will have a very comprehensive sphere of usefulness. Both Badi and considerable population, but they are scattered as sort a shepherd, and require to be sought out and rescued. Part of from Badi have visited the teacher and in kindness.

After Sunday on Wednesday, September 3, we departed from Mabunge, and early on Friday we reached Cape York, and had the happiness to all there.

The next thing is to get across to Redear Bay and the country. Of that, however, there is no doubt.

Most of the teachers are now well, and all but long to get to their work; but we have no crossing the two hundred miles of ocean that

They were much surprised and pleased on Thursday morning, 11th, by the arrival of the schooner, which they met at the wharf by the street Congregational Sunday-school). She is a boat—just the thing for Kaitau and Torotorano, inland of New Guinea, to enable the teachers to visit those places and Tuvani; and during the next season they will be able to come on here in safety.

An interesting occurrence took place during our stay, which, on account of its bearing on Christian progress, are appropriately noticed here. A large Sabbath School on the 18th August for some place in the island had proceeded but a short distance when it was overtaken by a party of about twenty natives, two of whom, one of them, on seeing Mr. Williams, a native boy, and a lad from Mary's band, called by the white men, Billy, his to Wecania." It was impossible to get the boat the white men and the loy could only cling to be drifted hither and thither as winds carry them. Every day they were obliged they had their water nor provisions. Billy swam to the shore where the boat was captured by difficulty, but he chose rather to be seized by his men, and share whatever dangers and privations with them. After being drifted about for sixteen days, they were cast on shore on Woody Island, but their water nor provisions were found on the condition as nearly as trying as when clinging ; and unless something could be done speedily, party at least must soon have died. Help might on an island three and a half miles distant, but to be reached? Brave Billy was equal to the task. He swam to the beach, and the island, he determined to attempt a man who had already been six weeks on the bottom of a boat, without any kind of sustenance to swim between two miles against a 31-knot tide and a 10-knot wind. After consulting with the crew, he decided to go to God's in prayer, and then to start, he said to Mr. Jardine, 'Charlie, catch the land mease you again; suppose I die. And so he set out in dependence on God, and said him to 'catch the land.' The useful help of the crew, and the party rescued. Of course, their grateful knew no bounds. Billy remarked their expressions, however. 'Don't thank me,' said he; 'thank God who has done it.' The captain was pleased to add that his conduct has been generally granted and rewarded. A testimonial has been signed by Mr. Jardine and his younger brother mentioned above as one of the surviving party, and a note connected with the settlement here, and a purse containing £15, is to be presented to ...the ceremony.
